At least for now, government workers have to wait until January for their free access to the single-sex bathroom they paid for in the first place. Right now, the York Region government only provides single-stall restrooms to transgender people, according to the province's policy on its website, at least in part because the region doesn't have any designated women's bathrooms. But these regulations, aimed at protecting transgender rights, leave some women out in the cold. "I think it's an absolutely ridiculous thing to leave out the women," said Laura Leach, a privacy consultant and community organizer in Toronto. "If the transgender men feel like they're entitled to use the women's room, then I think the women are entitled to use the men's room." Though some women's rights groups, like Bathroom Patrol, say they're not surprised that Ontario's Liberal government is now sticking to the regulations, the York Region employees told the Star they're furious, calling it discrimination against women. They're also asking for help from Toronto city council. At least two of York Region's four deputy ministers are women, and some York Region employees told the Star they've noticed more women are stepping forward since the policy came to light. "Now they're actually training
