A case is reported of a young woman with serological evidence of systemic lupus erythematosus, who developed a 3-month history of recurrent episodes of severe, generalized pruritus, nausea, vomiting, fever, and cyanosis. During this period, edema and a marked thickening of the skin over all four limbs ensued. Death was caused by secondary systemic infection complicated by multiple organ failure.Sea Level Rise Could Wipe Out Manatees Scientists working in Florida's Gulf Coast say the sea level is rising faster than they thought. The result is a threat to the Gulf Coast and of the manatee. In April of 2007 a giant hole swallowed up the Deepwater Horizon oil rig off the coast of Louisiana. Just over three months later, the rig was again sinking, this time in even deeper water. Now scientists are being told that even in the Gulf, water levels are rising rapidly and could soon displace the Gulf's 1.6 million people. Their concern is that areas of the coast could be inundated by rising water and that could have consequences for wildlife. If a reserve for manatees becomes too salty, the creatures are known to die. And that death could quickly and permanently affect the manatee population. "When the water goes below the animal, that could be the end of that animal," says Mark Haynie, the director of the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute. Manatees are large marine mammals that live near the water. They are well adapted to a life in the water, but they are not able to stay there for long because their skin becomes too salty. So Haynie says that if high tides reach some of the manatee♦
