A novel exon 9 HER2 mutation of the EGFR in a patient with lung adenocarcinoma. In this study, we investigated EGFR mutations in lung adenocarcinoma (ADC) and examined their clinical significance. We performed mutational analysis of the exons 18-22 and their flanking intronic sequences of the EGFR gene. Furthermore, we analyzed expression of the wild-type and mutated EGFR by immunohistochemical staining. We identified a novel EGFR mutation in exon 9, L858R, in a lung ADC patient who was treated with gefitinib. Among the 22 EGFR mutations found in the lung ADC specimens examined, we discovered three novel EGFR mutations, L858R, R820G, and A843T. One of the mutations, L858R, was originally identified in a lung ADC patient who had been treated with gefitinib. The patients with these EGFR mutations had better clinical outcomes. We have also examined the effects of the three novel mutations on tyrosine kinase activity of the EGFR. Our results suggest that L858R, R820G, and A843T have distinct biochemical properties as compared to other EGFR mutation. Therefore, the presence of these mutations may be a predictive factor for the therapeutic effect of EGFR-targeted therapy. Perinatal testosterone treatment reduces aggressive behavior and increases responses to danger in aggressive and nonaggressive male rats. Hormonal manipulation during adolescence has been reported to alter the development of aggression in a sexually dimorphic manner. However, because the effects of such manipulations are frequently attributed to changes in circulating levels of gonadal hormones, the potential role of endogenous gonadal hormones in mediating the effects of hormonal manipulations has not been tested. The present study addressed this issue by testing whether perinatal testosterone (T) treatment also affected the development of aggression in male rats. Infant male Long-Evans rats were given daily injections of T (given in oil) or oil (for controls) between postnatal days 3 and 21. These males were then maintained in a colony of adult Long-Evans rats, where they were housed with untreated females and were allowed to pair-mate. Subsequently, aggressive and defensive behaviors were measured in these animals. Results indicated that perinatal T treatment had a sexually dimorphic effect on two measures of development of male aggressive and defensive behaviors; it reduced the development of

Friday, January 28, 2012 Some news to warm one's heart. Arthur Whitney's daughter Julia (daughter of Claire Whitney and Edward Curtis) was widowed last year, when her husband, Eugene Smithe (a wealthy landowner) was killed when the stagecoach in which he was riding with John Rice and his daughter Charles' children (son Charles was also killed), was attacked by Indians at Deer Creek, Wyoming on September 23, 1887 (the incident inspired John Ford's film 3:10 to Yuma (1957)).[1] Julia was a cultured woman and a good writer. In 1897 she published an article in the Century Magazine entitled "Women in the Colonies," and wrote a number of stories and articles for children's magazines and newspapers. She and her sister, the actress Louise Whitney, both occasionally performed in stage dramas. In the December 13, 1926 edition of the Chicago Tribune, we found an article by Julia Whitney about her father. The article appeared in the 'Aging of America' section of the Tribune. Julia Whitney was interviewed by the Tribune. The article is interesting for its description of her life. She says she was born in Pennsylvania and educated at the Shimer College in Illinois. Julia Whitney is one of the few American female writers of historical fiction. She was a successful writer for more than 40 years, with many popular novels, articles, and poems published in periodicals. Her novels include American Magnolias, The Western Home (both published in 1880), An American Cousin in Europe, The Flower of Wyoming, The Squatter and the Star, and the well-known Soldier's Bride (1887). Whitney was married to Edward Curtis in 1856, and lived in Chicago with her husband until the early 1870s. Her second husband was Edward Smithe. They had two children. Julia Whitney died in Chicago on January 1, 1942. She was 88 years old. Saturday, January 1, 2012 This map of southwestern Wisconsin from the Carnegie Map Company is numbered and dated 1883. At that time, the maps were scaled to roughly one-tenth their final published size. There were a number of enormous maps printed at the time (see the series of "Frozen Echo" maps here). These were labeled "The All Powerful! The All Knowing!" which were cheaper to produce. The large maps were still considered standard and became the basis of many maps of the
