In the fabrication of integrated circuits, periodic structures are often created on semiconductor substrates for a number of purposes. For example, surface acoustic wave (SAW) devices are used in high frequency range. If such velocity in the material be established within the operating frequency range. If such velocity is too high, the acoustic signal will propagate through the substrate too rapidly to be useful in performing the desired functions. When too low, the substrate will not be suitable for the intended use. The prior art has relied on two principal methods for determining the velocity of the wave in the substrate. First, x-ray diffraction techniques may be used to determine the acoustic velocity. This method is expensive and inconvenient in that it requires exposing the wafer to x-rays, which may cause radiation damage, and which requires a costly, complex and dedicated analy
