Glutamine is the most abundant amino acid in the body of animals. Human body contains a large amount of glutamine. Supplemented with enteral feeding in the postoperative period of major abdominal surgeries, glutamine can improve the condition of the patients. Proteolysis is necessary for the production of energy in the intestine under stress. When the energy supply by enteral feeding is insufficient, intracellular energy will be used. The amount of alanine in the plasma after enteral feeding is more than that without enteral feeding. Thus, the patient's condition is improved. It is also reported that the plasma glutamine concentration after enteral feeding is higher than that without enteral feeding. This suggests that glutaminesupplemented enteral feeding may play an important role in protecting the intestinal mucosa, and in turn, it is thought to contribute to ameliorating the morbid condition of surgical patients.
