ing Sky jumping is an action sport, performed as a form of mountaineering, that involves a participant on a parachute jumping from a fixed, mechanical device called a pylon (or simply pylon) as high in the sky as feasible. Sky jumping is a very popular recreational activity in the US, but little is known of the safety and health impact. Sky jumping procedure Sky jumping involves a participant standing at a pylon located hundreds of feet above the ground. The performer hangs onto a cable and is lowered, either manually by a crew member, or using a cable-stay launch, to a specified height. At the prescribed altitude, the performer releases a parachute that is attached to the cable, allowing the performer to free fall towards the ground. If successfully deployed, the parachute will open and the performer will glide in controlled descent until touching down safely. Sky divers remain attached to the pylon until the parachute opens with wings deployed, shortly after which point they begin to harness (attach themselves to the cable) for the fall back to the ground, or may begin descending using free fall. Crew may steer by adjusting the aerodynamic forces on the jumper and tucking with it to control altitude and flight path. There can be up to 3 crew members, who are known as skydivers, and may act as a crew for one jump, or many. If there is more than one crew member, they follow the same fall pattern. Crew members are intentionally not in communication with the jumper immediately after the skydive, and the responsibility to ensure the wearer is protected rests solely with them until landing. Sky diving is safe if conducted according to recognized procedures, and failure to meet those standards can incur criminal charges.

Equipment Parachutes The traditional parachute is a round silk bag of a fixed size and shape. Sky diving or skydiving in modern practice means the deployment of a more advanced form of parachute, called a "parachute chute". A properly deployed parachute chute remains attached to the jumper throughout the skydive. About the size of a hand towel, with a square tail-hook and rectangular drogue to control the fall (in modern techniques, this may be done with sticks positioned vertically), it is attached to a four-rope harness. However, at separation of the parachute, this usually leaves the jumper with some free fall time until the parachute is fixed to their body by means of a large carabiner
