It's a polished and complete product." - Vita Game RoomLaser speckle photography for non-invasive detection of sub-surface hypoxia in adult mice skeletal muscle. Laser speckle contrast imaging (LSCI) of a tissue generates changes in its speckle pattern as a result of flow and can thus be used to detect hypoxia in skeletal muscle. In this study, we compared LSCI with laser Doppler spectroscopy (LDS) to determine whether LSCI can be used for the detection of sub-surface hypoxia in the skeletal muscle of a mouse model. In this model, mice underwent a sciatic nerve crush, which is known to induce sub-surface hypoxia. Prior to sciatic nerve crush, the mice were anaesthetized and their hindlimb perfused with BSA. After BSA perfusion, the mice were put into the LSCI apparatus, and images of the hindlimb were taken for 5 min. After BSA perfusion, some of the hindlimb were used to assess blood flow by LDS (see below) while other hindlimb were perfused with hemoglobin-tolerated 4% paraformaldehyde (PFA). Subsequent to fixation, the muscles were excised and paraffin-embedded. Some sections of the muscles were stained with pimonidazole. From these samples, cross sections with paraffin embedded sections were cut using microtome and stained with pimonidazole. Pimonidazole sections were analysed for quantitative analysis of the distribution of sub-surface hypoxia. Results of LSCI and LDS showed that BSA perfusion did not induce hypoxia in the hindlimb of the anaesthetized mice. In the second set of experiments, BSA perfusion induced hypoxia in approximately 50% of the muscle fibres. Although
