It was rejected and the next thing she knew she was editing her high school journal with a “Powr of a Pen” and going to summer college. She was hooked, up to that night- she would write every single day. Her journals became full of stories and poems, her mind reeling over the topics that would come to play after school. While still an adolescent, an itty bitty teenager of mind and body, she attended a college for creative writing and landed her first ever fic. She joined the struggling author’s collective which catapulted her into a job as an editor at a local college, and there she landed one of her very own poetry publications. Her writing followed no log line. Writing happened when the time came. She would write while at the library, during study hall, while doing homework, while watching a movie. This study was designed to assess the response of vegetation to altered environmental conditions associated with anthropogenic climate change, particularly increased levels of carbon dioxide and moisture. Using pinyon-juniper forests as a model ecosystem, we hypothesized that tree and shrub growth would be associated with the carbon and water balance of the ecosystem. We also hypothesized that increased levels of carbon dioxide and increased water availability will lead to greater growth of trees and shrubs. We measured leaf areas, nitrogen and phosphorus content of trees and shrubs and several foliar nitrogen-containing metabolites. We monitored changes in the soil water content and tested for changes in tree and shrub growth. We also evaluated the potential ability of the plants to compete with each other for water. The results of this study show a competition for growth space that was not related to increases in tree and shrub growth. In addition, elevation in soil water content by 4 to 5% was associated with increased leaf area and nitrogen and phosphorus content of trees and shrubs as well as a negative correlation of the foliar nitrogen-containing metabolites: nitrate, ammonia, and anion, with increased leaf water content.Gender and culture are just two factors that contribute to differences in masculinity and femininity. Others include socialization. The term “socialization” is a broad term that refers to influencing how we interact with the world and the ways in which we are brought up, as well as the consequences this interaction has. Socialization Just as a person who is left-handed, short, or female will differ from their counterparts in some ways, these characteristics are also tied to socialization. This refers to the way we are brought up, as well as the consequences this interaction has.
