What's new:

- AlchemyMP Smile Game Builder was an easy to use game editor that allowed players to create and host their own games, and export them for others to play. The game engine had several built-in functions and was extremely easy to learn, but also had very advanced features that allowed modders to create their own tools and change almost every aspect of the game. Smile Builder was an easy to use interface for both users and modders, and had some decent support for the.NET Framework.

Unfortunately, it got old quickly and recently ceased to exist. It was doomed from the start, however, because it was dependent on a flawed development model based entirely on commercial license fees, and was an early adopter of DRM in the form of SuperFish. It is a shame for the game and modding community that Smile Builder and its engine were so "upstaged" by a single commercial copy protection scheme. FOR THE LOVE OF SMILE: An Interview with the Creator of Smile Builder ZZZ wrote: Hello, this is ZZZ, one of the creators of Smile Builder! What was it like for you to create Smile Builder? Smile Builder was fun and challenging because we were creating a new genre of game building software We lived in fear of getting the new version for free. We could have sold we could have given away(spit), or could have made a revolution.. but then again, we are on the internet and we had fun! The modding community in 1999 was very young and a lot smaller then it is now, but even so we knew that digital media would eventually rule the gaming industry, which is what's happened. We could have had a digital age version of shareware right away but we lacked a digital platform at the time and though there were half ass attempts in the past, they were all made by "big players" and just never went anywhere. Back then, we were basically freelancing and trying to figure out the whole "INTERNET CRAP" ZZZ: What's something that Smile Builder does that is useful to gamers? Something that the current games do NOT do well is create a customizable frame rate. We're creating a new genre of games and one of the main things that make it such a great time in gaming is the ability to do something that you've never been able to do before. Smile Builder has
