Props are great tools For simplicity's sake, we'll use Photoshop to manipulate a base layer. In this case, we have drawn a spaceship, and we'd like to make it look like a frozen water drop. Here are the base layers: In the next step, we need to make a new layer that will be the basis for our freezing drop effect. Click the New Layer icon in Photoshop's main menu bar. Image ©Cara Semler For this tutorial, I used a drawing from Cara Semler. She is a freelance illustrator specializing in custom vector illustrations. New layer added to this screenshot. It is a simple rectangle. Open the Layer palette by clicking the eye icon (the arrow next to the New Layer icon on the main menu bar). Image ©Cara Semler Layers can have any number of effects added to them, and a layer can be duplicated to create as many versions as you like. Select the rectangle layer and choose Properties from the main menu. Image ©Cara Semler Make sure to name the layer "drop." Remember that when you work in Photoshop, layers have names that you can see on the Layers palette and that you can use to select layers easily. The Properties palette is the most important tool for working in Photoshop. It enables you to change the visibility and other properties of layers. Here's a look at how to control what happens when you move and resize a layer in Photoshop. Image ©Cara Semler "Rasterize" tells Photoshop what type of file this layer is. In this case, the layer is a vector image, so rasterize it. "Clone" allows you to copy a layer multiple times. We'll turn it into a raster image in the next steps to freeze it. "Lock/Unlock" locks the position and size of the layer so you can't move or resize it. "Lock All" locks all the layers in the document, so that you can't edit them. All the other options are fine to use, but if you're doing simple design edits, it's often better to lock layers to keep things cleaner and more organized. You can flip the visibility of layers to remove them. You can also copy and paste parts of layers into other layers.

Here's a look at some of the other properties you can control in the Layer Properties palette:

Re: Missing birthday post - only for a day Posted by Mum on November 19, 2012 I hadn't been on here for a month until I checked today and it turns out I forgot to post my Mum's birthday which was on the 28th. And you know what? She's not annoyed at all, never mentioned it... She's pretty cool like that. I'm still sitting here full of guilt. Oh, well. xxx Re: Missing birthday post - only for a day Posted by Mary on November 19, 2012 I had a little giggle at my mum's name and she's not bothered about missing out and neither is Peter! I actually, hadn't been on here for a long long time and just remembered last week that I was supposed to post a birth certificate for my mum. Will do that now and give you all a chance to send me birthday wishes, xxx, Mary When I type some query in Elastic Search I get some results as a response. Sometimes I get all the results in one shot. And sometimes there are some where I get no results. I believe my load test is not enough. Is there any other settings to find out why I don't get all the results in some cases? A: The Elasticsearch load test is a basic load test where we generate a random number between 1 and 100, and we can load for 100-5 times, so if your random number is 30, which is the number of times that Elasticsearch load test will load for, you can get a real-world estimation of the number of requests that Elasticsearch will handle. Also, if your requests are not covering all the shards of the index and are also not covered by the time for the random number to be reached you will not get all the results. Also, if you have a replica you might have some requests always hitting the primary server, and again you won't get all the results. This is not the only and the best way
