This suggestion is understandable coming from a bishop, but it is irresponsible coming from a member of the clergy. If my rector were to be so bold as to offer a "professional opinion" in such an area, I would be alarmed. A vicar of the church has no expertise in Islamic doctrine. To suggest that the Church of England should adopt an approach different from the approach of other Christian denominations is equally irresponsible. This is not a matter of opinion. This is a matter of the law. Muslims regard a Christian wedding as unlawful because of the Christian requirement of the consecration of the bride, while the Church of England has always regarded Muslim weddings as lawful because of the general consensus among Christian denominations that a Christian and a Muslim can validly and lawfully marry one another. I am a Muslim married to a Christian, and so I have an interest in the issue. But I am very skeptical about the suggestion that the law can be changed to avoid offending believers of Islam. Of course we are all required to obey the law, but unless and until a move to change the law is made, it is indeed unwise for any vicar to carry out such a marriage. I would like to know if it is also bad if the priest or the rabbi asks the couple to be baptized and to be baptized the same day, I mean the Muslim. The priest or the rabbi will not be asking that the couple be baptized, since they are already Christian and Muslim. The priest or the rabbi will be asking that the couple be baptized in the Church of England, to make the union of the couple Christian and that is the law. Maybe the vicar have to choose between his parishioners.

ABSTRACT[unreadable] It is known that fresh-frozen tissues have greater immune-related gene expression than corresponding paraffin-embedded tissues because of their inherent freshness. In order to quantify the effects of tissue type on immune gene expression we compared the gene expression of immune related genes in fresh-frozen tissues to their expression in paraffin-embedded tissues using microarray technology. We analyzed microarray expression data from fresh-frozen and paraffin-embedded tonsil and thyroid tissue and found a marked difference in the gene expression profiles. Gene expression profiles of 33 immune-related genes in 4 fresh frozen- and 5 paraffin-embedded tonsil tissues were evaluated by quantitative real-time PCR. The average fold difference in expression ranged from 12.1 to over 225 (with P
