I'm trying to implement an application where the user can login via PayPal, after he/she logs in the API will retrieve their Paypal address and extract their value and generate an API token based on their Paypal address. But this is where it gets tricky: When the user comes back to the application (after logging in via PayPal) and the API needs to be called, the authentication token needs to be send but it does not have this token in it (because its a new token based on a new Paypal address). Does someone know how I can achieve this? Do I need to store the authentication token in my DB as well? When I call the API and get an authentication error, it needs the token to authenticate. Do I do something wrong by generating the token based on my own Paypal address? [UPDATE] The idea is to have an API call to retrieve payment from Paypal, that only allows the user to call it once a day. (this API call will get a token that allows access to the API with this token the API will do some stuff and then give a response back with the result (success/error).) After the API call is done, the API needs to get the result and save it in a database for an application that uses it for a database connection. (this is the call e79caf774b)
