The porous fluorinated aromatic separator material is provided to remove the contaminants from the process stream after it has passed through the UF/PEG-350 circuit. The UF/PEG-350 circuit used in the above described system must be very compact, in addition to being able to remove all the contaminants that are present in the reactor effluent. All of the dissolved contaminants, including soluble fluorine compounds, must be removed. The UF/PEG-350 circuit has a significant role to play in the overall recovery of valuable valuable products from the process stream. But the circuit is much more difficult to construct than would be expected. The intrinsic problem in the above described system is that the UF/PEG-350 circuit will not effectively remove the majority of the contaminants. There is a long felt need to improve the ability to remove contaminants from the process stream. One particular technology that is being developed to improve the removal of contaminants from process streams is the use of reverse osmosis systems. Known reverse osmosis systems use a semipermeable membrane to remove a variety of contaminants from the process stream. The reverse osmosis systems generally use a very large number of membranes and associated devices to obtain the required efficiency in removing the contaminants. Known reverse osmosis systems are provided using a matrix of spiral wound membranes in the form of a bundle of tube segments, usually having lengths of between about four to eight inches, that are clamped and rotated between two housings. The housing inside the bundle is provided with feed and raff
