The petroleum sector giant Chevron Corp. announced it would pump an additional $5 billion into the construction of a massive new gas project in the Permian Basin. The news follows a seemingly inevitable ramp-up in costs after the company announced a $5 billion expansion of its flagship Wolfcamp field in 2012. Chevron can now more than double the amount of oil and gas it plans to produce from the existing Permian acreage, currently some 80,000 drilling locations. Over the course of the last year, the company has begun to ramp up construction of the $7 billion Rio Mesa project as well. Rio Mesa, also known as the Motiva complex, will bring in more wells, larger platform pads, larger gas processing plants, and more crude trains to transport the fuel to Gulf Coast refineries. A major part of the project's construction expenditures will be focused on gathering and loading the crude to trains, which Chevron executives said was one of the reasons the company had not already made the move. "One of the things that were holding us back is that we weren't ready to start building the larger, heavier trains that we need," Wirth said. The company has made a few other changes to its operations in the Permian in recent years. Chevron has spun off its interest in its Midland Field, based in the 6d1f23a050
