To test the program's preview functions, I took photos of a few locally printed magazine ads and a couple of national ads I've seen, all using an iPad, a MacBook, an iPhone, and various cameras. In Photoshop, all the images were straight out of the camera—shots downloaded or taken during my travels, whether on tablet, laptop, or smartphone. That gave me the opportunity to look at the quality of each image along with its consistency (if using the same printer from ad to ad), timing (if using EF lenses), and setting (the lighting and use of Photoshop features). Each test yielded the same result over and over: Photoshop passes with flying colors, especially when working with secured remote files. Developers can now store their IPTC camera information with pictures. In my testing, I did not see any new IPTC data showing up on images that were created without IPTC data. However, it might not be 100% accurate, since I haven't specifically tested that feature. I should have done that before writing this article. Also this version brings content color, grayscale and spot color support for layers. You can, effectively, create a layer that's simply a fill color. Content color enables you to fill a layer with a specific color while content grayscale lets you fill the layer with a selection of the layer's content. The spot color feature allows you to make the layer a specific color that's used throughout the rest of the picture. Scrolling through the steps of Photoshop Elements may be important if you're trying to locate a particular export option. There's now a new Quick Exports section at the top of the application. There, you'll find four options: Automatically organize your images and then optimize them by removing (or not turning) the background, automatically optimize your images and then choose the best one, or select a specific photo, then twice choose the best auto one, and finally choose an exact photo. The latter replaces the Remove Background option, which, honestly, I don't see often these days.

To achieve true transparency, our Adobe software team worked with WebAssembly (WASM) experts and the Chrome Web Components team to port a desktop version of Photoshop to the web. On the web, Photoshop is fully compatible with the Emscripten compiler for running it on the Web as a WebAssembly (WASM) library. WebAssembly technology is a web standard that allows developers to opt-in to low-level, garbage-collected, native code. This approach offers performance gains and a simpler program execution environment compared with most browsers' script-based approaches. Working with WebAssembly and Emscripten was a big challenge. Guilherme Rambo of webcompat.js, the Chrome developer tools maintainer, explains in a Medium post: "Sharing WebAssembly-enabled web applications with the rest of the Web ecosystem has rarely been easy. The majority of content that comes out of traditional content vendors are Electron-based applications, including Adobe, and, like Adobe, they have been struggling with issues of performance, browser compatibility, and platform interoperability. "We had been working with Adobe to ensure that the web application is browser-performant and cross-platform," Finally, JavaScript is not powerful enough to deal with different image file formats, which is why Photoshop natively supports the P3 color space. Guilherme says there's no way the web could handle this power without WebAssembly, which is now supported in Chrome 73, for web developers who want to take advantage of JavaScript performance and native APIs. 933d7f57e6
