With Lightroom, it's not so easy to edit so much, because most of it still depends on layers. For example, the most commonly used shortcuts in Photoshop are the ones found in the Edit menu. When opening layers, you're forced into a new mode, like Smart Brushes, which can provide a basis for many options. After getting this image, I started playing with different filters, adjusting the color and trying to get different effects. I was able to do that, and make that happen in the first edit without going to the separate layers in the image. Filters can be both practical and creative. You choose a filter, like the Artistic Effect, Lightroom, or the Basic, then select the area you'd like to apply the filter to, and Photoshop does the rest. This makes it much easier to experiment with effects and let your creativity flow for those times when you don't know where to start with an image. I hope I will have time to play a bit with the Black & White option. There are many things I would like to do with the B&W option. For example, I would like to try it with a high-contrast image that will make heads spin and keep people's eyes glued to the image. For the most part, however, I'm still looking forward to seeing how I would be able to reduce the file size of my images, and make the images look much more retouched. I also haven't been able to decide if I would like a panorama, as a lot of people still love doing it by hand, or if I would rather compose the image with the lens, like in Lightroom.
