New Delhi: A letter purportedly written by Pakistan's Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf to his Indian counterpart Pranab Mukherjee has been published in the media. It is over three years since Musharraf left India for self-imposed exile. Musharraf has been the chief of Pakistan's Armed Forces, and its Prime Minister, from 1999 until 2008. In 2003, he dissolved the Parliament, bringing an end to the democratic rule of Pakistan. The letter and op-ed published in the Indian news magazine Outlook came in response to Mukherjee's call for cooperation in the field of science and technology. Musharraf, according to a report in Indian Express, called for the strengthening of "peaceful nuclear cooperation". It appears that the two leaders have got along well, at least politically. They also have a common aim of developing ties with the United States, from where both have sought to distance themselves. India and Pakistan have been at war since 1971, although the two countries have periodically locked horns over the recent past. In early March 2015, Pakistani military sources had said that the country's nuclear programme had a range of 15,000 km, twice that of the country's nearest rival China. The South Asian rivals have since claimed that their nuclear arms are "defence-capable". Pakistan is known to have several missile delivery vehicles, though the precise capabilities of these can't be assessed. It has also been reported that Pakistan has expanded its missile programme in recent years. This has increased tensions with India, which is known to have a far more advanced missile programme. Pakistan also has an arsenal of 80 nuclear warheads. India has 20. The two countries have never gone to war with each other, but tensions have periodically escalated. Over the years, India and Pakistan have signed, and subsequently violated the terms of, multiple treaties and defence co-operation agreements. This has led to the two countries having limited co-operation on border security. In December, Pakistan had sought India's help on its border security. Two days later, India became the first country to cross into
