Photoshop EXpress

We focused heavily on camera raw development in this release, improving every aspect of the software in order to gain the performance necessary to make the new features available on the desktop right alongside the cloud-enabled versions on the Web. Photoshop's main focus is and will always be to let you create the images and photos you will love to print, display on screens, and create compelling digital images that look like the ones you use all the time. Although you can use Photoshop diligently to work on slide and Web projects too, there's a basic set of tools and controls that already work well for most of the tasks you need to accomplish. For new users, the easiest way to get up and running to create the work you love is to use Beginners Tutorials — we've got them at the top of both the Help menus and on the Sidebar. In between Learn and Learn More, you'll also have the option of diving in to Advanced Training too. In fact, a lot of articles and workflows are available in both Help and Help. You can still shoot RAW but its another mode. After some time I uninstalled Photoshop, I only use Lightroom and shoot with only the Fujifilm cameras I already had. I found Adobe PS6 to work well, but I don't see a future in it. I don't like the whole "scripting" thing. The new tool is a bit odd sometimes in it's operations. I do not want to get into why else, I think it's fine to have it and it's probably not the only thing you can do with it. I do, however, see it being quite useful and being mostly universally applicable. When it comes to potential future use of things I personally think, for example, that scripting is very nice one the web. Adobe's "scripts" for images are nice, but I think in the future they might like to include some scripting for the whole catalog, which of course should work with external applications. I am already seeing pen-testing stuff with "auto-add-capture" scripts importing thumbnails for printing tasks.
