With this new feature, you can share your PSD for review within a few clicks using the mobile device of your choice along with a price tag. You can choose to preview the changes inline or to send the file for H&D (hence the name) review, with the client and project manager utilizing the H&D review simply by providing their device for the inline preview (which they need to do first). If you are unfamiliar with H&D, it stands for Help and Design. Doing H&D means more than just beta testing the file—it also means designing and implementing any features that may be missing or pose issues for clients or stakeholders. The H&D process is typically done on a desktop or laptop. It's a check-by-check activity with each concern needing to be addressed until all major issues are resolved. This process may be lengthy, but it is often one of the most valuable assets to the client. In the digital design world, this check-by-check activity is needed more than ever because vanishing shadows, pixelated tints, and other issues become more frequent. To give this new process a go, simply click on the H&D icon in the file tab and choose the device that you'd like to use for the inline H&D preview—that's it. Now, you can review, adjust, and send the file for H&D all within Lightroom using this new feature! Once you are done, sharing can be easily completed by simply choosing to 'Export as' from the social or sharing menu, and selecting the device and project you would like to share the file with—it's that simple.

Photoshop works by storing important adjustments in a graphics file. An image file may have several adjustments. For example, a picture may have parameters such as exposure, saturation, contrast, etc., as well as several layers of transparency effects, filters, and masks. These adjustments are shown in the Adjustments panel—noted as either global adjustments or layer specific adjustments. You can also make adjustments directly on the canvas. For example, the Dividers tool can be used to fine-tune the color of a selection. The more you work with adjustments, the better you can become. Photoshop allows you to work with layers by placing them in separate image groups. When you group layers the way you want them to come in context with each other, they become easy to work with. For example, a logo, a background, and an interior design were stylistically grouped. You could easily modify the logo, whereas other layers remained unaffected.
