The AI-based features that distinguish Adobe's Photoshop from its competitors remain, and the layout and interface of the program remain spectacular. You could, I suppose, debate the continued relevance of such features in an age where you can get a phone or even a DSLR with a collection of image-editing tools, but I think that those features, if adapted and developed even further with the help of algorithms, machine learning and artificial intelligence, can still be effective. This, after all, is the future of Photoshop. The problem with many AI-powered tools is that they appeal only to those who have a powerful enough machine to run them. If you're running an iPad with a limited set of CPU resources the overall quality and usability of any AI-powered tools will not be what the advertiser and the manufacturer believed when they expected you to buy their product. So, I had to spend a while researching on that one, but here's my issue with the iPad Pro—I own devices with middle-of-the-road, "moderately powerful" (to most people) devices called "devices that aren't much more powerful". These devices are all Apple-made, but do not run the latest and greatest iOS updates, and will not be upgradable, once they're purchased. I want this criticism (while my iPhone 11 Pro typically runs apps that are much more powerful than this device can handle, as can the iPad Pro) Update 7/15/2020 16:00 ET: I've updated this review to reflect that the latest beta test of Photoshop Sketch, 7/16/2020, provided, by Adobe, only offers the ability to edit a single image at one time.
