So, how do you determine which subject is the best?

Simple, color, and value are the first things you need to consider. Often, you would paint out the rest of the photo but that's not quite right. The real problem is getting your eyes to fall in one place. This way, we can use the "Focus Stacking" function in Lightroom to combine photos that are all of the same focus point. The first route is simply by using the "Best" selection (second from the left on the overview page). Its purpose is to let you choose the subject of your Best Image. The second route is to use the "Other" selection to look for something specific to pull out to make the Best Image.

For example, you might have a rather large area of snow and have to choose the one containing the tastiest looking one! All in all, like I said at the beginning, this is some helpful information that I hope you find useful. No doubt the RAW formats of Fujifilm and Adobe are converging, but there will always be some small quirks. I hope that as this progress, more people will come out in support of RAW development as a whole. Adobe Elements can do a lot of things, not just light editing, but also burning and scanning. With this, we will be able to achieve full far-reaching functionality without the slow 3D heavy CPU impact of the legacy API, while making the best use of modern technology like multi-core CPUs and the General Purpose Graphics Processing Units (GPGPUs). The hope is that this would lead to a far simpler, more powerful and streamlined Photoshop experience in the long term. All of this should be considered as an initial version of our future roadmap, and we expect to update our blog constantly as we progress with the feature releases, as well as address comments.
